Mountains Without Sherpas

The world has seen a dramatic change in the style of climbing the world’s highest peaks. Once a playground for alpine purists and the world’s most technically skilled climbers, these mountains have become increasingly accessible to just about any climber with the willpower and the money. With this in mind, CMC member Ted Handwerk reflects on the changes he’s seen in climbing these peaks since his early days in the Himalayas. The following is from his 1988 climb on Mt. Everest.

It’s 1988 and I’m on the North Ridge of Everest. They call this China but all I feel is Tibet. Only a handful of expeditions have been here since Mallory and Irvine in 1924. We share the entire north side of Everest with just one other team. We camp at the same fresh water spring as Mallory and Irvine. My tent could be set on the exact same spot as theirs 64 years earlier. We traveled 18 exhausting days to reach BC (base camp) from Lhasa. We pushed, pried, and hauled our vehicles across washed-out jeep roads. An earthquake destroyed the last major bridge we had to cross just one day before reaching BC. Today teams travel three days in air conditioned SUV’s on paved roads to reach BC. My team of five climbers is the first to leave BC for the mountain. We know which valley to ascend. We have a vague idea what to expect. On this first trip up the mountain I find a hidden memorial to Mallory and Irvine, and a section of their telegraph wire they ran from BC to ABC (advanced base camp) which is twelve miles long. We turn the yaks back above camp II because of a gaping impossible-to-cross crevasse. We continued on to ABC with minimal supplies. We cook dinner using bamboo stakes and cardboard and we freeze that night. The next day, in an old Chinese expedition dump, we find enough materials to make a bridge over the crevasse so yaks can haul our equipment from BC to ABC. After a week we returned to BC. I make four such trips up the mountain, always with new challenges and new dangers. We lead every pitch, set every rope, and haul every load and stake out every tent. We are just a tight-nit group of American climbers. No sherpas. No guides. No miles of fixed line. Today there are 500 climbers at this BC every season. Fixed lines are set by an army of sherpas from the base of the mountain to summit. Sherpas also carry a majority of the loads, set tents, and cache mounds of oxygen bottles on the mountain. The mountain is literally lines of climbers ascending miles of fixed lines. It would be rare to find expedition members on any team who had ever climbed together before. Life-long climbing partners are rarely found together on the slopes of Everest these days. Our modern world and its modern ways have arrived on Everest. Climbers look for achievement instead of the enjoyment of exploration. Instead of personally interacting with nature, it’s a battle to overcome nature. Perhaps having lost the true meaning of exploration and adventure, our new climbers feel compelled to measure themselves in other ways, not by hard-earned skill and experience but lists of summits conquered. Lost are the delights of the struggle, whether we succeed or fail. Decades of alpine climbing to gain skill and experience are traded for guides, sherpas, and an excessive number of oxygen bottles. What happened to the sheer joy of climbing? I think we are witnessing the slow death of exploratory mountaineering. I cannot deny that today’s Everest climbers are still mountaineering. These climbers still have to have fortitude; they still need strength and courage. I guess I’m just an old mountaineer sad to see my old mountaineering ways coming to an end. Times change, and time demands change. But I do feel sorry for Everest’s soul. I think it must be weeping.

The Boulder Compass Is Going Green!
The Boulder Group will stop printing the hardcopy version of its monthly newsletter with the October 2009 issue. Beginning in November, the Compass will be published in its electronic version only. The decision was made at the Boulder Council’s June meeting, based on the substantial cost of printing the newsletter (the paper version of the Compass consumes 30% of the group’s discretionary income). This will also align with the club’s conservation efforts to reduce paper production. (Reducing is better than recycling!) The Council still recognizes that the Compass is a very important and integral part of our club and it will continue much the same in its online form, which many members are already reading. We realize this change may require a modification in the way you access the Compass. If you have not already done so, the first step is to subscribe to the Compass electronically through an option on the state website. The Compass will be sent to your email address each month. Please check your “profile” on the state website to ensure your email is correct. For those who do not wish to provide an email address, current and past Compass issues are always available on the Boulder CMC website. Detailed instructions on how to access the electronic version of the Compass will be provided in a future issue and individual help will be offered at the upcoming Annual Dinner on November 7. For questions or concerns contact the current Council chair, Dick Munro, at chair@cmcboulder.org.
